In 1990, the first of the new "reforms" began to take effect. The government began to privatize state-owned enterprises, and to open up the economy to foreign investment. This led to a period of rapid growth, with the economy expanding by over 10% per year. However, this growth was not sustainable, and the economy began to stagnate in the mid-1990s. This was due to a number of factors, including corruption, inefficiency, and a lack of investment in infrastructure. The government began to implement further reforms, but these were also hampered by corruption and inefficiency. The economy continued to stagnate, and the government began to lose support. The first step toward a sound, reliable, and effective system of child support is to establish a legal obligation for parents to support their children. This obligation is established by the state through the child support laws. The state then enforces these laws through the child support enforcement agency. The agency is responsible for locating the noncustodial parent, establishing paternity, and enforcing the child support order. The agency also provides information and assistance to parents and children. The agency is a key component of the child support system and is essential for ensuring that children receive the financial support they need to thrive.
